

A suggestion is:

- have the transportation carrier carry epipens and an antihistimine

In 2008, we were travelling through the new Shanghai airport. The Chinese were not familiar with Benadryl (an antihistimine) and placed it through the airport's machine that checks out liquids. The benadryl was confiscated. the there can be safety issues if the epipens got into the wrong hands - but perhaps some security process can be put around it. When we got on the plane, we were informed that the plane had benadryl so that was good.
